

It is long past time for the FCC to start doing its job and enforcing non-partisan regulations upon media conglomerates like Sinclair Broadcasting Group. This organization controls more than 70 television stations (including networks), allowing it to have an undue amount of centralized control over media across the country. That would be okay in itself, if Sinclair hadn't already proven to be a clearly partisan organization that panders to the right wing agenda. In choosing to force their stations to preempt normal prime time television to show an obviously politically motivated "documentary" like Stolen Honor, Sinclair has crossed the line into what was once only seen in places like Communist Russia, where media bent to the will of the government.

It's time for the FCC to enforce impartiality among network stations.
